Whether it be in the world of art or commerce, achieving one's objectives usually entails having a clear, unified vision that serves as a guide. An art museum, however, must operate with double vision, if it is to be a truly dynamic entity. While it presents treasures from the past and honors established and well-renowned artists who have contributed to our cultural heritage, it also promotes the current work of contemporary artists who are exploring new directions. Accommodating these two, almost opposing functions is not an easy undertaking.

The Newark Museum has met this challenge admirably. While it boasts a world-famous collection of Tibetan sculpture and paintings from over a one-thousand-year period, as well as noteworthy American paintings and sculpture from the Colonial period to the twentieth century, it also has pioneered innovative programs, such as the New Jersey Artists Biennial, and sponsored educational activities that stimulate community involvement.

It is quite fitting that the New Jersey Arts Annual: Clay and Glass exhibition helps inaugurate the grand reopening of The Newark Museum's newly expanded facilities, for through the years, the museum has championed crafts as a fine art form, providing the much-needed exhibition space for New Jersey's professional craftspeople. The New Jersey State Council on the Arts extends its best wishes to The Newark Museum as it opens its doors to a new era, and wishes it continued success in maintaining its vision.

Elizabeth G. Christopherson
Chairman
New Jersey State Council on the Arts
Four years ago, we referred to the first New Jersey Arts Annual: Clay and Glass exhibition as a landmark show, for it signified the introduction of crafts into a major visual arts series. Today, in the Garden State, it is inconceivable that crafts would not be included in a program designed to celebrate the achievements of New Jersey’s artists and provide increased exhibition opportunities.

Innovative, exciting, high-quality shows have brought thousands of people to six of New Jersey’s prominent museums, generating a greater appreciation for the diversity of crafts by New Jersey’s professional craftspeople and firmly establishing crafts in the realm of fine art.

This Clay and Glass exhibit has historical significance, however, for it marks the end of the New Jersey Arts Annual as it has been known. Rather than dividing the shows into four categories—clay and glass; printing, sculpture, and drawing; fiber, metal, and wood; and works of art created in multiples—the New Jersey Arts Annual will feature two categories, crafts and fine arts, with shows to be held in the spring and fall, respectively. This consolidation will enable artists to have their work juried for an exhibition once a year. We also anticipate an even greater number of entries, which will guarantee consistently high-quality shows.

The New Jersey State Council on the Arts is proud to have provided the leadership for this national model and to have worked closely in partnership with The Newark Museum and the five other participating museums as well as with New Jersey’s finest visual artists and craftspeople. We look forward to a vibrant future for the New Jersey Arts Annual and welcome residents of and visitors to New Jersey to share this great cultural resource.

DIRECTOR'S STATEMENT

It is a special pleasure that the first New Jersey Arts Annual to be hosted by The Newark Museum coincides with the grand reopening of our new complex, designed by the architect Michael Graves. When the New Jersey State Council on the Arts introduced the Arts Annual concept five years ago, and drew together the coalition of six museums, we were just entering the first stages of our Master Plan. The intervening years have seen unprecedented growth among New Jersey’s cultural institutions, and The Newark Museum has been no exception. With the simultaneous unveiling of the Arts Annual Clay & Glass exhibition and The New Newark Museum, we are presenting to the people of New Jersey — and to the entire country — a complete vision of our role in the museum world. The Arts Annual exhibitions hold special importance for us, as they represent our historical interest in promoting and exhibiting the arts and crafts of New Jersey. It has not been an accident that the Clay & Glass exhibit is accompanied by four other shows in our new galleries which feature the artistry of clay and glass workers from the beginning of this century to the present day.

These companion exhibitions demonstrate our eighty-year-old interest in clay and glass, and in the transformation of these media into articles of beauty and utility. The New Jersey Arts Annual Clay & Glass exhibition may be the first such exhibition in our “new” museum, but it will not be the last. As the Arts Annuals continue to develop and expand with time, we will continue to support them as part of our ongoing commitment to excellence in the arts and crafts, not only in New Jersey, but nationwide. By being part of the museum coalition behind the Arts Annuals we are not only upholding the goals we share with the New Jersey State Council on the Arts, but maintaining the forward-thinking and timeless ideals established by our founder, John Cotton Dana, eighty years ago. I am proud to carry on this tradition.

CURATOR'S STATEMENT

The role of crafts in America continues to be debated, even as some declare that the debate is long over. Clay and glass are particularly entrenched in this debate, as they are the most deeply rooted in the homely traditions of domestic life. The wrangling over art versus craft began with this century, and has frequently centered on ceramics and glass. As we near the end of the twentieth century, we see many potters and glassmakers being called artists. A good number of these have abandoned the traditional “decorative arts” viewpoint of their medium and have entered the world of sculptural work. Still others have kept within the traditional forms of clay and glass while transcending the functionalist stigma of craft. Finally, there are many potters and glassmakers who have continued to produce purely traditional vessels, without shying from the “decorative arts” label which many of their peers have sought to escape.

As curator of this New Jersey Arts Annual Clay & Glass exhibition, it was my goal to see that some sort of balance was maintained, and that all possible aspects of form and technique were represented. In other words, I hoped to be able to indicate the full diversity of what clay and glass craftspeople in this state are producing today. To achieve this end I picked my jurors for their special interests; Mark DelVecchio for ceramics and Jerry Raphael for glass. Mr. DelVecchio, as director of New York’s Garth Clark Gallery, has a broad knowledge of American and European contemporary ceramics, as well as a deep knowledge of ceramic history. Dr. Raphael, well known as a long-time collector and supporter of the contemporary glass art movement, has a similarly broad historical understanding of glass as a medium. I decided to cast myself in the role of third juror to inject my distinct curatorial viewpoint, developed in the course of nine years working with the enormous glass and ceramic collections here at the Museum. I expected to find myself acting as mediator between the opposing viewpoints of the “clay” person and the “glass” person. As it worked out, the three of us formed a surprisingly smooth team, each individual willing to suspend prejudices in favor of the others’ perspectives. The result, aside from the great enjoyment of the two-fold jurying process, is an exhibition which is extremely diverse in its aesthetic, and very broad in the technical ground it covers. There are indeed a number of pieces in this Arts Annual which could just as easily have been entered in a painting and sculpture exhibition. But there are also traditional glass and ceramic techniques and forms included, as well as pieces which combine old traditions with new artistic visions.

As a decorative arts curator, I see many things in this exhibition which do not fall within the parameters of what I consider to be decorative arts. But, as the curator of this particular show, and a co-juror, I see a marvelous array of objects which express the remarkable creative impulse to be found within this state. It is precisely this crossing of the mythical boundary between art and craft which makes this show so complex and evocative, and which made it such a pleasure to produce for the people of New Jersey.
